2. You need to know...

- Some people's morality (ideas of right and wrong) is absolute (it never changes; some things are always wrong or right). For others, it is relative (right or wrong depends on the situation or consequences).
- Aims of punishment: justice, retribution (revenge), deterrence and reformation
- Many Buddhists say that we are responsible for evil and only we can do something about it
- Many Buddhists believe that our intentions determine whether an act is skilful or unskilful (right or wrong). Evil acts arise from selfishness or greed. Good acts arise when we think about others and consequences.
- The Howard League for Penal Reform is a charity campaigning for a better society through changing the prison system
- The Prison Reform Trust is a charity campaigning for better treatment of prisoners and victims
- The Angulimala Society provides Buddhist chaplains to prisons; they support prisoners in overcoming emotional and mental problems
- A theodicy is an explanation for the presence of a loving, fair God in a world where evil exists
- Some Christians say as a result of the Original Sin or Fall from God's favour, evil is in the world and all humans need God's forgiveness
- Other Christians say that we couldn't be truly "good" if evil and suffering didn't exist, but we need God's help to avoid sin and become better beings
- The idea of "the sanctity of life" leads many Christians to support the death penalty. Others to oppose it

5. Contexts

Many ideas about dealing with crime in the UK stem from Bible teachings. Most non-religious people support the justice system, so what can we learn about shared beliefs and values?

The two prison reform organizations we study have clear views on how criminals should be treated. How does this fit within a "human rights" culture? What about victims of crime?
